Very helpful for the new, timid fermenter

By rural girl

Hi - I have been pickling for a few years & have been buying fermented foods for many years (I guess we all do) in any case, this year was the year I started fermenting. To start this process I needed to study, so I bought the The Art of Fermentation: An In-Depth Exploration of Essential Concepts and Processes from Around the World book; I had heard a wonderful interview with him on NPR one day ... maybe that was the spark that ignited the realization that I could ferment too ... his book is fascinating & full of interesting historical information and extremely full but there are no real recipes or actual steps to fermenting ... which, as I've gotten more bold, is helpful.

I needed a book that had actual steps & recipes, and that was why I bought this book The Complete Idiot's Guide to Fermenting Foods. I like the step by step recipes. I like the clear observations of what can happen and what to expect. Most recipes do include lacto-fermentation and there is a convincing reason earlier in the book ... but if you're not up to all that she does tell you how to do every recipe without the lacto-part; although after reading about lacto-fermentation I do feel it si probably a really good way to go.

The Nourishing Traditions book has a very good description of lacto-fermenting, and I have enjoyed her book quite a bit; every food chapter has reasons for making those health choices in the side-pafe of the recipe & it's a very good read ... her recipes are often the longest way of doing things ... I've been making beef stocks for years & years and her recipe is good, but I never take or have the time to roast the bones, I never waste wine in stock and I only have time to cook a stock for 11 hours max and sometimes only 8 I think she was recommending far more than 11 hours ... and many of her recipes are the absolute best & most complicated way of doing things.

Since starting to ferment I have made a delicious batch of mead, mostly using Sandor katz's book; it is effervescent & delicious! This weekend I am making a big batch of saurkraut. I have also made wonderful kimchi.

Have a good day!
