A classic home spun novel

By Ed

This was one of the authors best among many others of credited attributes in literature. This set in the 1950 style era, a young man coming into young adulthood is mentored by his grandfather in the ways of woodlore, fishing, human nature, dogs and hunting, The learning of natures way as taught by grandfather to his grandson. These ways are all most non existent in this day and age. I myself growing up in that era was one of the most memorable of my life and will carry those to my grand children. Life long old timers etiquette and humor make this a classic. A grand read.

This book is glimpse back into an America that is rapidly vanishing. Robert Ruark can rightly be considered the dean of serious sporting writers. Gene Hill is very good, but only wrote short pieces. Hemingway was vaster, but his angst and internal gordian knot muddy the clear waters. Ruark walks the top rail of the fence: you get the very best of it all. And nowhere does he do it better than in his two "Old Man and the Boy" collections. Others here have said it, but there are stories here that will break your heart clean in two with their aching beauty, their crystal clear images, the smells and tastes of a life spent in rural North Carolina before television. My personal favorite is "September Song", which is, along with "The Road to Tinkhamtown", one of the two or three finest pieces of American sporting literature ever put down. Any appreciation for American sporting literature must begin with Ruark, and any study of Ruark must begin with the Old Man. Without him, you'll never grasp "Horn of the Hunter", or even "Uhuru" or "Something of Value". The Old Man is the key to all the locks. Favorite quote: "Only hunting and mountain climbing are sports. The rest are just games."
